The typical workflow in parallel computing has a problem which is generally described as “easy” in one phase and “hard” in the next phase. A dual scheduling method is an example of a workflow. A dual scheduling method is one of methods of solving this problem, and, in this method, an easy problem is divided into subproblems called blocks, and a hard problem is also divided into subproblems called blocks, so that the overall solution can be carried out in one computation. As a method of scheduling problems, there has been proposed a method of solving both an easy problem and a hard problem into blocks each having at least one of a kernel phase and a reduce phase, and solving the easy problem first and subsequently solving the hard problem. Q: Trigger Function within a Function call I'm trying to make a web scraping function that will check every URL for a unique title that I have. However, I'm struggling to find a way to trigger a function within a function when that function is called, as I'm trying to do with the following function: `urls = ["", ""]` `def scrape_url(title):` for url in urls: if title in url: scraped_data = scrapesite(url) return scraped_data This function works well. What I can't get working is the part that returns scraped_data, as I just can't seem to trigger that function within the function. I've tried: `scrape_url("scraped_data")` `scrape_url("return scraped_data")`
Calling the function outside the loop and then passing the parameter scraped_data as an argument to the function. A: You can use yield to return the scraped_data. `def`
`scrape_url(title):` for url in urls: if title in url: 3da54e8ca3
