Food insecurity is common in low-income communities, but less than half of the food-insecure children get the recommended nutrition services. Home management for children who are food insecure has been demonstrated to positively impact food access, but there is a dearth of research on its impact on nutrition outcomes. Our aim was to determine the impact of home management on food intake among low-income, food-insecure children in transition from primary to kindergarten.

Randomized controlled trial. Families with children in the nutrition at-risk population, designated as transitioning from kindergarten to first grade (age 3 years), were recruited. Food-insecure children were randomized to receive either home management (HM) or usual care (UC). HM was home-based, individualized coaching and a household food audit to encourage a diet consistent with the USDA Food Guide Pyramid. The primary outcome was change in dietary intake of energy and nutrients of children at the end of first grade. Secondary outcomes included the time spent managing the home food environment, knowledge of food guide recommendations, food quality and acceptability, and child behavior/nutrition. Three hundred forty-eight food-insecure children and their families were enrolled. The intervention group had significantly greater improvement in intake of energy and nutrients than the UC group. The HM group had significantly lower rates of parental and child criticism of
